MODULE 3: MANAGING THE HUMAN ASPECT OF YOUR BUSINESS

21/10/2021

Module 3: MANAGING THE HUMAN ASPECT OF YOUR BUSINESS

OBJECTIVE: To help businesses to develop a strategic human resource management and human resource development approach for supporting their business development and growth.

Module 3: Managing the Human Aspect of your Business

The content of this document does not reflect the official opinion of the European Union.
Responsibility for the information and views expressed in the website and publications lies entirely with the authors.

1. BACKGROUND

Note: this Module should be considered in conjunction with Module 4 – Staying on the Right Side of the Law.

Usually, when one thinks about human resource management (HRM) they either think about people or about systems and processes that need to be implemented in a company in order to manage this resource. In reality, both need to be managed, although there are many obstacles and challenges. While bigger companies operate on a systems level, often times this kind of approach influences their capability to fully explore the human potential and the opportunities this provides for the growth of the company, because it gets tangled in all sorts of organisational, often even bureaucratic provisions. On the other hand, in small and micro companies, there is often a lack of systemic approach, and human resources management issues are considered on a case-by-case basis, without really thinking about the role of these resources in the long-term. This too affects the ability of a company to optimise the support provided to it by successful human resource management.

Of course, human resource management is not a discipline that can be easily described and categorised. And even if one manages to have a good grasp of the discipline and what it is supposed to entail (one way or another), it is a fact that managing human resources in a company is always about dealing with a variety of people who DO NOT behave in a prescriptive manner, pushing them towards achieving organisational goals TOGETHER. There has been much research confirming the positive connection between employee satisfaction and productivity of a company, between employee development level and their individual performance, the motivation of an employee and their loyalty to the company etc.. So, before we start with explaining the basics of human resource management, please note this: there is an ever-growing need for managers to recognise people not just as their resource but as individuals in their own right. Increasing the sensitivity of management in this regard is the best prescription we can give you in relation to dealing with people in your company. Today this is becoming an even greater necessity (see for example the following link). After that, some basic processes also need to be addressed.

Having completed the BIC for SME Diagnostic evaluation earlier and having identified gaps in terms of human resources management knowledge, this module provides a template whereby the user can deal with issues of concern to the business such as:

- Setting HRM strategy and goals,
- Recruitment, selection and strengthening of the organisational profile as an employer,
- Basic HRM and HRD processes and concepts (such as organisational culture).

2. MODULE GOALS (MODULE DIAGNOSTIC, ROADMAP & DELIVERY)

2.1 Module Goals

This module is directed to helping businesses to develop a strategic human resource management and human resource development approach for supporting their business development and growth. This module contains five sections, which will support entrepreneurs, so they will be able to:

1. understand the extended role of HRM for success of entrepreneurs,
2. approach, strategically design and implement HRM in small and micro businesses,
3. understand the processes and issues of recruitment,
4. know basic HRM processes,
5. implement Human Resource Development processes,
6. have an insight into supporting positive organisational culture.

2.2 Plan the Training Module Process

2.2.1 Undertake a Diagnostic Assessment / Baseline Survey

In order to identify the key aspects to success in terms of Human Resource Management, you should use the BIC for SME Diagnostic Tool for Entrepreneurs. The BIC for SME Diagnostic Tool will highlight areas of strength and weakness for the Entrepreneur and will provide a Roadmap in terms of the actions to be undertaken to enhance your knowledge and competencies. This Roadmap is supported by a visual Concept Map, which provides a visual representation of the Module where you can highlight key areas to address.

2.2.2 Develop a Training Roadmap & Action Plan

Following the initial Diagnostic or Baseline Evaluation and in order to make the training intervention effective, it is important for the Mentor / Trainer / Consultant to:

1. Select the elements of the Creating a Business Module to be covered and set timelines for same.
2. Set the training sequence (i.e. organize topics based on importance (as per the Diagnostic evaluation), impact, interactions, etc.).
3. Select the pedagogy (how the selected elements of the Module are to be covered in terms of practical work, lectures, reading material, exercises, etc., as well as linking them with other relevant BIC for SME Modules).
4. Set Action plan and Milestones to be achieved – KPI (see Section 4).

5. Determine Outputs - assess the result achieved (see Section 5).

2.2.3 Delivery of the HRM Module

The delivery of the Module should take approximately 12 Hours (including supported and (primarily) independent learning).

This module focusses on human resource management and human resource development issues. The content is adapted according to the needs of small and micro companies, which are somewhat differentiated from the needs of middle and large-sized companies. When necessary, this will be specifically emphasised in the content of this Module.

An entrepreneur needs to work through the issues and tools in this Module to understand them in a practical sense and make the best of their use. However, a certain level of sensitivity in dealing with these matters, particularly those which pertain to changeability of human resources within the company, is in order. In our experience, this is the most crucial point in HRM: we encourage entrepreneurs to build a more comprehensive, strategic HRM framework in their businesses and at the same time support them in its flexibility. In short: HRM is one of the most fluid aspects of managing a business. Be prepared!

Following your Training / Mentoring / Coaching intervention, you can use the Diagnostic Tool for Entrepreneurs a second time and assess the progress made in terms of enhanced knowledge, competencies and skills.

3. CONTENT OF THE MODULE

3.1. Module Content

This Module looks at key issues in creating a business including:

3.1.1 Understand the extended role of HRM for success of entrepreneurs

- Assessing an entrepreneur's understanding, knowledge and skills on HRM

3.1.2 Approach strategic design and implementation of HRM in small and micro businesses

- Set clear visions and goals in terms of employment matters
- Envision and design the HRM processes needed
- Set up monitoring and evaluation

3.1.3 Understand the processes and issues of recruitment

- Design recruitment strategy and channels
- Selecting the right candidate
- Strengthening the organizational profile
- Set up HRM planning

3.1.4 Know basic HRM processes

- Learn about employment law and regulations
- Develop rewarding/sanctioning system
- Support talent management
- Consider employees performance management elements

3.1.5 Implement Human Resource Development processes

- Design and Implement Mentoring, Training and Education
- Explore the Competency Approach
- Set Knowledge Management Principles

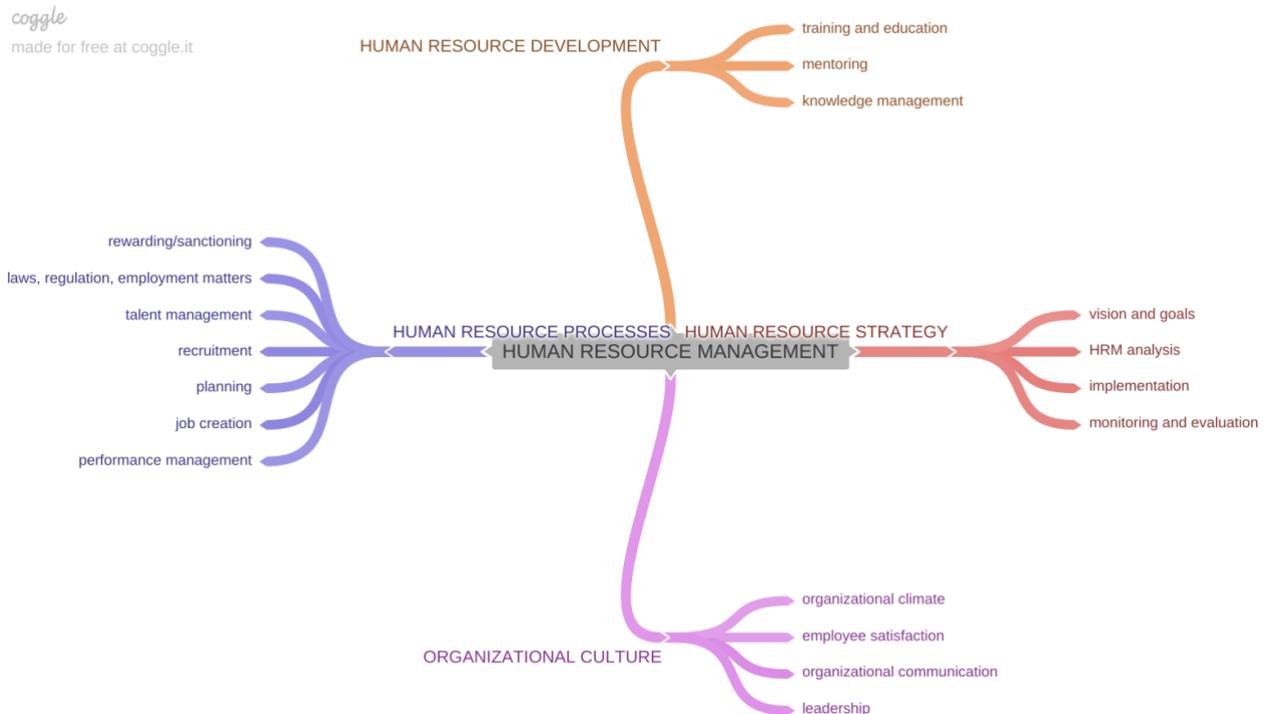

3.1.6 Have an insight into supporting positive organisational culture

- Analyse employee satisfaction and organisational climate
- Set up organisational communication, including employee participation
- Concentrate on leadership characteristics

Note: HRM is directly impacted by other aspects of business and is significantly influenced at least by the size of the company and the sector the company is operating within. Moreover, in many cases, dealing with HRM depends on the individual as well as group characteristics of people in the company and the collective organisational culture which is established. Managing human resources is thus not just a set of tools to be used but rather an understanding to be developed and, later on, turned into a management competency.

To ease this process an overview of the Content is provided below and can also be found in The Diagnostic Tool in the Roadmap Worksheet.

Section 3.1.1: Understand the extended role of HRM for success of entrepreneurs

HRM is usually regarded as a process that is more applicable in a company in the later stages of its growth. That is a common misconception: while it is certain that HRM is much different and usually more elaborated when a company matures, it serves an important point in the beginnings as well. So the following questions need to be addressed by the entrepreneur:

Question:

I am still an one-man band and am not yet ready for a proper HRM plan. Is that correct?

Answer:

No, it is not. HRM is about strategically addressing the need for employees, but also to make a perfect fit between their knowledge, skills and competences and the company's goals. Even if you are a one-man band, it is important to acknowledge what your company needs (or will need in the future) in terms of the latter. Ask yourself:

- Do you possess enough knowledge to run a business or is your knowledge more related to the product/service you intend to offer?
- Will you be able to coordinate all tasks in running your business? Do you know enough about marketing, selling, accountancy, law etc.? How will you manage the need for those aspects of information / knowledge?

The BIC for SME Diagnostic Tools offers a great opportunity for you to systematically address the gaps in your knowledge. Run a general Diagnostic Tool to see what are your strongest and your weakest points. After that, you will need to plan for gaining the missing knowledge.

Question:

I realise there are some aspects of running a business that I don't know. What do I do?

Answer:

Part of HRM is planning for the knowledge needed and making sure it is applied at the right time: once you have a clear idea on the knowledge/skills/competences needed for the success of your business, you need to decide how you are going to obtain it:

- Will you learn everything you need to know by yourself? How much time will you need for it?
- Is there a possibility of including someone else in your company: your family, friends, colleagues?

- Can you propose a business partnership to professionals you need?

Regardless of the options you select, it is not recommendable to ignore aspects of business, which are unknown to you. Maintenance of a high level of knowledge in all aspects of business diminishes the possibility to fail and increases the success rate significantly. Of course, there will be cases where you will make mistakes, but be aware: learn from them and implement them in your future business processes. Including knowledgeable and competent human resources in an integral part of success.

Section 3.1.2: Approach, strategic design and implementation of HRM in small and micro businesses

Strategic Human Resource Management is about setting clear HRM plans that support the growth of your company. Set a clear vision for your company:

- Ideally, what does your company look like in 5-years time? Is it still just you, a one-man-band, or do you envision the employment of other people? Are you relying more on a network of known business partners that supply you with the knowledge needed in specific areas?
- What kind of knowledge are you planning to outsource, if any?
- What kind of people do you already work with? If you are considering employment, what kind of people do you think you (will) need?
- What is the general company's culture which you would like to grow? Are you supporting more informal relationships within the company or are you partial to a more strict division of roles and consequently more formal environments and culture?
- What kind of leader would you like to be?

Setting this kind of vision gives you a better grasp of your needs and sets a clear idea on the image of your company in a couple of years HRM-wise. This exercise also poses an opportunity for you to start searching for ideal employees/partners at the beginning of your business and alongside your business growth. Be aware: your vision will probably vary in time, but planning for it is highly relevant at this point as it serves as a compass for your development. On that note, in our experience at this stage, it is highly advisable to set ambitious visions that also act as an internal motivator. So be brave!

Tools:

- the FRESH project, Tips and ideas to define mission, vision and value
- the FRESH project, a simple SWOT analysis, focusing on the aspect of human resources

Once you feel that you have a firmer grasp of your ideal, focus on the assessment of the current situation, your own knowledge/skills/competencies and those of your future collaborators/employees:

- Where will you get the necessary skills? How long will it take you to attain them? What is the foreseen budget you need to have for this purpose? Did you consider it in your business plan?
- Where will you search for suitable collaborators/employees?
- What will you offer them? Partnership, payment, rewards, opportunities to grow, etc.

These questions are important as they offer a starting ground for strategically building HRM processes for your company. As said, at the beginning this might include only a couple of actual tasks you perceive as HRM. Nevertheless, try to set a clearer picture of a strategic approach you might adopt in at least 5-years' time: which part of your company does each HRM task currently identified contribute to in the long-term. Here are some more guidelines on building a HRM strategy. But bear in mind: at the beginning, a HRM strategy might only consist of a few careful considerations which we've already set out earlier in this text. The BIC for SME trainers will assist you with the complexity of a HRM strategy you might set.

One of the most important aspects of strategic HRM in every company is its constant adaptation to current demands of business. A common mistake of companies when they grow older and bigger is setting too strict a strategic frame that does not correspond to what the company requires at a given moment. For this reason this is a lesson to always remember: HRM should contribute to the satisfaction as well as success of the company's employees. When this is the case, employees will fully contribute to the company's business goals. Once one realises this is not the case, a revision of HRM processes is in order.

For this reason too it is important to set up monitoring and evaluation of HRM, both contributing to getting quality feedback information on the success of HRM processes (and later on, systems) implemented. While there are many possibilities for getting feedback information (by using questionnaires, interviews with employees, periodic reports etc.), the main objective of these activities is basically to maintain a perception of whether the implemented HRM is working (supporting company's business goals by ensuring overall employee satisfaction). Here are some of the most emphasized elements of evaluation of HRM on the level of the organisation, some of them are also described in the article we provided :

- Measuring of organisational effectiveness and efficiency
- Employee behaviour: absenteeism, disputes, fluctuation, lateness ...
- Employee satisfaction
- HR service levels

- HR scorecard (see more on the latter in Section 3.1.6)

Note: the discussion in this section pertains to evaluating HR function on the organisational level and not particularly on the level of the individual!

Section 3.1.3: Understand the processes and issues of recruitment

When one decides to employ new people (or find business partners), the main question is where to find them. While in larger companies these processes may consist of many different activities, micro companies most commonly search either by personal contact or via employment and recruitment agencies/agents. There are, however, some more considerations in regards to recruitment.

Recruitment channels and strategy. Presuming you have a clear idea of knowledge/skills/competencies you require in a new employee, start with the obvious channels (personal contacts, employment agencies, traditional and social media ads, scouts ...). Here are some tips on how to develop this process:

- Make sure your expectations are realistic: you will most likely find that the ideal employees as you envisioned them do not yet exist. Usually they are skilled in several or, in best cases, most of the skills an entrepreneur requires, but they are not perfect just yet.
- When recruiting, consider which skills your new employees will need to be trained in and define only 3-5 traits that you insist upon already when the new employee enters your company.
- Don't focus too much on the knowledge and skills a company needs in terms of providing a service or product but focus also on the personal characteristics of employees. While the former can be attained gradually, the latter are almost unadaptable and can affect significantly the overall company culture. For this reason, an entrepreneur needs to consider how new employees will fit in with existing company values. What kind of values you would like to maintain? See more information on this in Section 3.1.6.

Selecting the right candidate. An integral part of recruitment is the selection. There are a lot of different methods for this, including interviewing candidates, testing, psychological evaluation etc., with the end objective being to find a good candidate for the job envisioned by the entrepreneur. We present you with an exemplary set of questions that you might consider for selection, but the most important is the following consideration: in order to find a “perfect” candidate, it is crucial to know what exactly are you searching for and how does that fit with the current situation in your company (see also previous considerations).

Tools: The Fresh project, Set of interview questions.

Set up HRM planning. We plan either to introduce new employees to the company to further develop their competencies. In the beginning, human resource planning might consist of just a simple Excel document where we can systematically take notes of activities to be consider in a certain timeframe (recruitment, training, company's internal events etc.). You might utilise also one of the many programs that are set for this purpose. Once your company grows, it is important to monitor regularly the needs for employment as well as the current disposition among them. Companies have different practices on how they organize this process, also including the use of many available IT tools for this purpose. In strategic HRM, the planning usually starts in the third quarter, along with budgetary planning for the next year. It is advisable that micro companies too set a period in which they review their plans in regards to the needs for new employees or development of current employees (for example, every 6 or 12-month period).

Strengthen your organisational profile. When recruiting, an entrepreneur needs to consider also the characteristics of his/her company and what the outsider perception is of his/her company: How do people see the entrepreneur himself/herself? What kind of image would you like your future employees to have of your company? What are your company's values and how do you communicate them?

Question:

How do I know how people perceive me and my company?

Answer:

Be aware of the feedback information you gain in various places. Consider also the latent elements of your communication, your so-called informal, non-verbal communication (usage of logos, consistent graphic image, personal presentation, etc.). This is where HRM is more closely connected to activities of marketing and PR and overall corporate communication. In the case of small and micro companies the main communication on the values of the company relies on the entrepreneurs themselves. Make sure to establish a clear image of what you would like to project to the external public, not only customers, but business partners and (future) employees as well. See some more on this matter in the following link.

Section 3.1.4: Know basic HRM processes

There are many different activities relating to human resource management in companies and at least as much paradigms as to what exactly HRM entails. While it might be interesting to delve into some of these considerations (see for example the following article), at this stage it is enough to recognise at least the basic processes:

1. recruitment/talent acquisition,
2. compensation and benefits management (salaries, rewards, sanctions, performance appraisal and management),
3. training and development,
4. employee/labour relations and organisational communication,
5. compliance management, corporate responsibility and diversity matters.

Some of these processes will be explained a bit more within this module, but it does not make them more important, the selection being made on a basis of what is immediately applicable to small and micro companies.

The most important lesson here is: business is people! Although many times there is a tendency to objectify human resources as just another resource in a company, there is no other company's resource that is more unpredictable. As one employee once said: "I am an employee, but I am also a person. I cannot shut out my human side only because at the moment I'm at work. I cannot objectify myself any more than production machines can develop emotions and instinct." So make sure to incorporate the following:

- Be on a constant lookout for new employees, even if you don't need them right now. Implement several ways to attract them to your company.
- Take special care on the issue of benefits management, but pay attention: money is only a starting motivational factor, make sure there is a clear idea on rewards and sanctions and performance management in your company.
- Make sure to maintain a high level of knowledge in your company, acknowledging also the wishes, expectations and suggestions of your employees.
- Make sure to emphasize clear values of ethical conduct in your company, acknowledge diversity in your organisational culture.
- And most important, start developing your own competency in organisational behaviour and work psychology and make sure to consider this also in planning HRM.

Learn about employment law and regulations. This is one of the most recognisable HRM process among companies: dealing with employment contracts, safety regulations, health provisions etc., leads to significant red-tape activity that takes up a lot of a company's time and effort. While it is undoubtedly a really important aspect of conducting business, it is not what HRM is all about. A description of key provisions on employment law and regulations that every entrepreneur needs to consider when conducting business is provided in Module 4. Take care to organise your business in accordance with these provisions, either by establishing clear documentation for yourself or by engaging a professional to do it for you (in Slovenian as well as Italian practice, a lot of these aspects are covered by entrepreneurs' accountancy firm, at least in the initial stages). However, make sure, this is not the only aspect of HRM you engage in within your company. Neglecting other aspects of dealing with your employees will for sure result in unfavourable situations that will cost you time, effort and money in the later stages of your growth.

Develop rewarding/sanctioning system. Rewarding/sanctioning can include compensation and benefits management, where companies mostly deal with salaries, monetary and other kinds of rewards (worktime flexibility, benefits such as organized sports activity, usage of company's facilities etc.). These aspects closely relate also to performance appraisal and management issues, but – as in case of employment law and regulations – in larger companies these activities often turn into a detailed system of systems, processes, measuring, evaluations etc., whereas in smaller companies it is a common practice for entrepreneurs to discuss this with their future employees on one-to-one basis. While at the beginning this might prove suitable, it often proves to hinder human resource development in later stages of growth, when these practices still exist, even if the company is in need of a more system-like approach. To avoid such problems we have found it a useful practice to discuss with entrepreneurs on their expectations in matters such as:

- What kind of behaviour do they expect and want to reward or sanction? (this is usually an element of the appraisal system later-on)
- What is the upper monetary rewards they are willing to offer?
- What kind of benefits do they consider suitable for their employees in addition to monetary rewards?

In regards to rewarding/sanctioning system, two more considerations are in order:

- Be clear on your opinion on this matter, but at the same time consider the rewarding/sanctioning in your company from the employees point of view as well. What is an employee's expectation? What reward / sanction would they expect to see in relation to different kinds of behaviour?
- The key word for efficiency of any system and for rewarding/sanctioning system is consistency. For certain, the development of such systems will require some consideration, time and energy, but once it is implemented, it needs to be consistently applied in all situations for all employees. In the case of small business, it means that a certain level of objectivity will need to be ensured by the owner/manager of the company. Failing to do so will lead to perception of unfairness. In practice, this is one of the most difficult competencies for entrepreneurs to gain, which is why we urge you to seek your trainers support with this.
- If the rewarding/sanctioning system does not correspond with employees' expectation, a revision is necessary. When possible, employee participation is recommended when re-designing such systems, allowing entrepreneurs to gain a detailed insight into motivational factors for its employees.

Support talent management. There is much research on this matter, discussing everything from the definition of the term to processes and IT support for implementing it in companies. An idealistic version of talent management is that it contributes recognising the potential in people an entrepreneur is dealing with, trying to engage them to work with you/for you and keep on “caring” for them, so they want to stay in your particular company and contribute even further to its growth and success. This is where it usually gets complicated: the larger the number of employees, the more difficult it is to get common basis that would motivate the majority of employees. Pay attention to (future) employees’ needs, particularly those who have a motivating effect and support their own developmental objectives.

Question:

How do I determine which employees are to be included in my talent management practices?

Answer:

First determine who are your key and perspective employees: key employees are those who already play an important role in your company and contribute to operational and/or developmental processes in the company. Perspective employees are the ones who have the potential to develop these characteristics and roles in the future. Observe your employees, pay attention to these two categories and put specific focus on them. There are many listing of favourable characteristics of employees (see for example this article), but pay mind to the actual needs of the company and compare them to possible talents the company is interested in including and developing once a person enters the company.

Question:

How do I know what motivates my employees?

Answer:

In the initial stages of a company this encompasses things like a one-to-one conversation on a regular basis, where an entrepreneur is focused on the needs of his/her employees and on the elements that might favourably influence their performance. When the company grows, further methods need to be engaged on a company-system level (annual interviews, surveys etc.).

Consider (employees) performance management elements. As in any management discipline in HRM there is a lot of focus on the Key Performance Indicators, either on the level of a company or at the level of employees. For details see Module 10. Key performance indicators are basically a system of metrics that is used to show the contribution of HRM to success of the company or rather its business strategy. Needless to say, it is not an easy task, but is one that is necessary to consider. There are numerous examples of KPIs in HRM, measuring key results areas (for example, in recruitment one might measure - average lead time to recruit employees or performance score of an employee in a particular time span; in training – training hours per employee, in employee retention – % of employees that leave the organisation in a certain time period etc.). The bigger the company the more complex the system of measuring becomes. In the case of small and micro companies this would mean that an entrepreneur should:

- Emphasize and objectify as much as possible those key areas he/she considers important for his/her company development (for example, gaining skilled employees to manage project in the companies) and particularly, set HRM objectives for the company;
- Set KPIs and milestones (for example, to attract a skilled project manager by the end of the year);
- Set methods for monitoring and evaluation of attainment of these KPIs (for example, regular reporting in a six-month period).

There are several tools to assist one with this, one of the most popular being a HR Scorecard, that reflects the HRM strategy in line with the overall business strategy of the company. But what is even more important is that the information attained gets considered in the future strategic development of the company. In other words, when an entrepreneur is faced with a set of information pertaining to the achievement of set goals, these need to be evaluated, considered upon and implemented in further actions. This particularly applies when the company is growing.

Fig 3.2: Example of a HR Scorecard (Source: <https://www.analyticsinhr.com/blog/hr-scorecard/>)

Recruitment Strategy Map			HR Scorecard
			KPI	Current score	Target
Strategic	Most innovative organization in the sector		<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Position in the sector-wide innovation benchmark • Time to market of last 5 new products in days 	5 121	Top 3 95
Employee growth	Hire more qualified professionals		<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Satisfaction score of manager after 1 year (quality of hire) 	0.70	0.85
Financial	Decrease of recruitment cost		<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Recruitment cost in Dollars 	4 MM	3.5 MM
Process	Decrease of lead time	More attractive employer	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Time to hire in days • Acceptance ratio in % • Top employer benchmark 	38 70% Top 40%	25 90% Top 20%

The same principle applies also in the case of measuring employee individual and group performance. Considering their own perception of their work and further professional development and based on their characteristics, employee performance targets need to be developed, supported by other HRM practices such as training, rewarding etc.

Section 3.1.5: Assist an entrepreneur in implementing Human Resource Development processes

The primary function of HRD is to improve the performance and competences of employees, making them more motivated to achieve organisational goals. The justification of HRD lies also in the already established realisation that satisfied employees remain committed employees. Personal and professional development strongly influence the employee perception of their satisfaction, therefore increasing also the value for their employer in terms of their future employment. We consider HRD in relation to (1) recruitment and entrance stages as well as (2) employee compensation and benefits that are connected to work design and job development.

Usually, due to small number of employees, small and micro companies do not require an elaborate human resource development strategy, but need to set some strategic processes to support it anyway.

Mentoring, Training and Education. This is probably one of the most recognisable HRM and HRD practices. It supports practically all stages of employee engagement within a company, from the start to finish. However, despite of the general recognition of the importance of mentoring, training and education, in our experience entrepreneurs in practice do not consider these processes systematically and often forget to include them in planned activities. The key factor of success in this stage is in acknowledging where these processes are most needed in your company and linking them to addressing the needs on a company as well as an individual level.

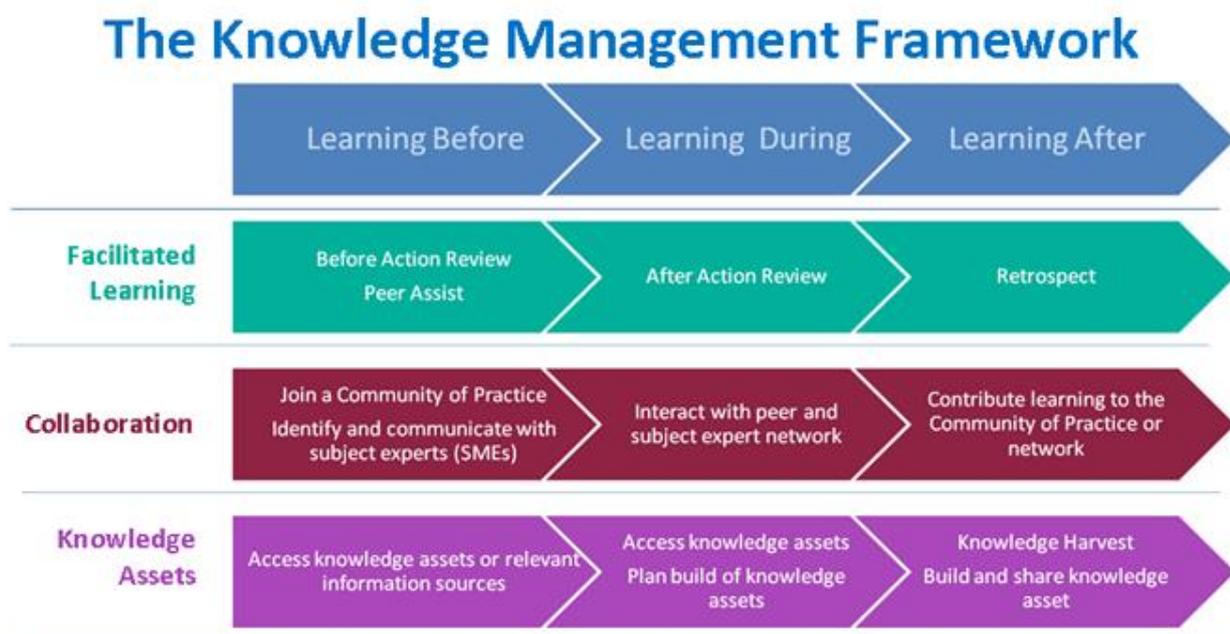

Competency Approach. While in traditional HRM, a company has dealt with job development and description, training and education planning, benefits and rewards systems, the competency approach surpasses the linear consideration of these processes and introduces simultaneous tackling of all the above. The main focus of a competency approach is a so-called knowledge management, which allows a company to direct attention to retaining and strengthening knowledge that support the overall business strategy of the company. An entrepreneur needs to ask himself/herself the following:

- What are the basic knowledge, abilities and expertise that form the company's competitive advantage in terms of products and services?
- How do I combine knowledge and skills of my employees to achieve this competitive advantage?
- What HR processes do I need to support the development of my employees competences?

Knowledge Management Principles. While competency approach is directed to strengthening the competences of employees, knowledge management is to a larger extent focused on creating, sharing, using and managing the knowledge of an organisation. This would include innovation management, developmental processes in the company, creating suitable organisational communication paths as well as supporting employees to be able to provide all the latter.

There are numerous discussions on the role of knowledge management, some perceiving it as a simple means of providing necessary information and data, others emphasising its value capacity and decision-making prerogative. From our experience, companies stress too much the data component of knowledge management, thus losing the potential for creating more structured relations that can – combined with creativity and innovation processes in the company – lead to new innovative company products and services. See below by way of example of such practices. It must be pointed out, however, that knowledge management is one of the most complex HRM practices, which requires significant consideration, which is why it is our recommendation to engage an external expert, when planning a detailed management system in the company.

Section 3.1.6: Supporting positive organisational culture

While a lot of business strategies relate to facts, charts and figures, in truth, business is about people. In HRM this is most evident. For this reason, HRM does not only deal with evident processes and systems, but it delves also into the most complex and fluid element of organisational dynamics: organisational culture.

Employee satisfaction and organisational climate. There is an important difference between organisational culture and organisational climate. The most illustrative example is the one of the iceberg: organisational climate only reflects organisational culture and is much easier to spot, like a tip of the iceberg. However, it is just an indication of the elements of organisational culture that go much deeper than that: the values, the myths, the founding beliefs of the employees are one big indescribable iceberg.

Fig 3.4: The representation of the company culture iceberg (source: <https://blog.empuls.io/iceberg-model-of-culture/>)

As such it is almost impossible to change or manage it. Organisational climate is usually established by observing employees' satisfaction, by questionnaires, interviews, reports on absenteeism etc. By doing so the company gets an important insight into the behaviour of employees, their values, motivational factors and possible deviations in comparison to the overall organisational goals. In the case of small and micro companies the predominant values are those of the owner/entrepreneur, which is why in such cases the following is important:

- set a clear articulation of employees' expectations;
- lead by example;
- communicate clearly your values and goals.

Set up organisational communication. Organisational communication can be an elaborate set of information and communication channels spread throughout the company. The larger the company, the more complicated the system. These kind of systems are strongly directed to transmitting information, ensuring constant flow information in order to deal with everyday activities. However, there is another function of organisational communication that often gets overlooked and is even more evident in the case of small and micro companies: the relationship function of communication. With every person-to-person communication a communicator translates not only the content, but also its own meaning of the information he/she is transmitting, coloured by his/her own experiences, beliefs, interpretations. By such the relationship between individuals or groups are formed. This is especially evident in the case of single entrepreneurs, which is why many entrepreneurs seek training in communication. Entrepreneurs should consider the following:

- Do you have a clear view of your own values in business in general?
- What kind of values would you want to support in you company?
- What kind of values do you expect with your employees?
- How do you communicate your values?

Inconsistency from leaders in terms of values and expectations lead to lack of trust with employees. Lack of trust leads to deviant behaviour, which an entrepreneur needs to address immediately in order to avoid conflicting organisational values in his/her company. This is also the reason why so many companies are developing structured organisational communication systems, to ensure the participation of employees in generating future organisational behaviour as the latter is changing.

Concentrate on leadership characteristics. In the 20st century leadership was about setting the strategy, implementing control over the tasks set and performing as a spoke-person, representing the company to stakeholders. Nowadays a leader is much more than that: a visionary, mentor, coordinator, motivator, strategist, communicator etc. But is it enough? Who is a skilled leader? Or rather: who is a competent leader? Research show that in addition to leadership traits (see for example this article), personal characteristics are becoming more and more a factor of success in leadership, because leadership is inseparable from a person conducting a leadership (or for that matter any employee) function. Regardless of size and sector, a leader – through communication as well as by setting an example – is projecting predominant organisational values, which cannot be learned, but are acquired via personal socialisation and development.

In small and micro companies, entrepreneurs are usually very much focused to their technical skills, related to the product or service they are offering. When confronted with the need for leadership, entrepreneurs usually reach for leadership trainings and workshops, which can be effective to a certain level. Nevertheless, a leader needs to strengthen their self-awareness of their personal characteristics that influence their employees as well. From this point of view, an entrepreneur needs to be honest with themselves: does he/she have it in him/her to be a leader? If there is an indication of an entrepreneur not being able to assume a leadership position, it is advisable to delegate this function to other people in a company or outside of it.

4. ROADMAP & ACTION PLAN

Having completed the Diagnostic evaluation and having identified the key issues of concern or knowledge gaps in terms of supporting a business, your Trainer will have been able to set out a Training Roadmap on specific issues to do with Human Resource Management issues.

As outlined in Section 2.2, the Training roadmap (learning path) is a structured sequence of training activities proposed to teach a topic. While it should be comprehensive, it also needs to be practical, in order to organise the learning over a series of sessions. It will ensure that users do not omit crucial content because lack of time and that they will achieve fluency in key elements of the topic. Steps:

1. Set the goals derived from the BIC for SME diagnostic needs check (see Section 2)
2. Set out the Roadmap and Action Plan by selecting the elements of the Module to be covered and timelines (see Section 2)
3. Select pedagogy (how the selected elements of the Module are to be covered in terms of lectures, reading material, exercises, etc.,) (see Section 2)
4. Set sequence: organize topics based on importance (as per the Diagnostic evaluation), impact, interactions, etc.. (see Section 2)
5. Confirm Action plan and Milestones – KPI
6. Output: assess the result achieved

Having understood and practiced how to use the various tools and templates contained in the Module (steps 1 – 4 above), you should be able to identify (ideally with the help of a Trainer / Coach / Mentor) a set of action items including a timeline indicating: what is to be done, by whom, when and how. Examples are provided below:

4.1 Action Plan

What	Who	When	How
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Have you set out clear vision and goals for your HRM strategy? • Do you understand what role it plays in the development of your business? • Are you familiar with basic HRM processes? 	Promoter	6 weeks	Discuss with the Trainer

<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Do you know where to find potential employees? • Do you have a clear idea on your team roles? • Do you have a strategic view of recruitment within your company in the future? 	Promoter	6-8 weeks	Discuss with the Trainer
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Did you research all the legal matters and employment regulations? 	Promoter	6-8 weeks	Professional sources
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Did you consider mentoring, training and learning processes in your company? • Did you familiarise with different approaches in this area (such as a competency approach)? • What is the method of retaining and building on knowledge within your company? 	Promoter	8-12 weeks	Discuss with the Trainer
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Did you consider your values and how you want to present yourself? How do you communicate them to the external and internal public?
Etc.			Etc.

The BIC for SME Diagnostic / Assessment Tool and Roadmap can provide entrepreneurs with a 'take away' in the form of a handout thereby providing them a practical guideline on tasks to be completed.

4.2 Countermeasures

Not all Action Items will progress as planned. It is important, therefore, that you consider some Countermeasures (if possible).

- Use a recruitment agency to identify and attract suitable employees for your business.
- Outsource administrative matters to do with HRM.
- Use a communications expert to better communicate to your present and future employees.
- Etc.

5. FOLLOW-UP & OUTPUTS

As with all plans, it is important that you monitor output achieved against the original Diagnostic evaluation, Roadmap and Action Plan (you can undertake this with the support of your Trainer / Mentor / Consultant):

Task / Objective	Outcome (Date)
Research the current legislative situation regarding employees	To Do
Write a presentation of your company, emphasising your values	Done
Consider your business in 5 years and list competences you will presumably require in your employees	Done
Fill in the diagnostic tool, see where you lack knowledge	Work in progress
